Beautiful White House Grounds Ready For Mr. Wilson's Convalescent Period

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 17.—After months of careful planning by Mrs. Woodrow Wilson and weeks of painstaking work by the head gardener and a large corps of skilled assistants, the wonderful flower beds in the grounds of the white house are about ready to bloom in all their fragrant loveliness. Even greater care than usual has been exercised this year in making the grounds attractive because of the convalescence of the president and his evident intention to spend the larger part of the summer at the executive mansion. Although quiet and although subdued by the same high iron fence there is no concealment of the beautification of the grounds. The north front of the white house will be the scene of the most attention from visitors to Washington. This front facade Pennsylvania avenue, and although subdued by the same high iron fence there is no concealment of the beautification of the grounds.
